In all the land vertebrata, however, a firmer skeleton is required, and the greater part of the cartilaginous skeleton therefore becomes replaced by bone; while equally firm bones are at the same time developed from the softer blastema before described. Thus there appears to be no necessity for cartilage as a matrix for the development of bone, unless required on account of its greater firmness; and Meyer s assumption that everything in which bone is formed is cartilage, is both a begging of the question, and, at the same time, incorrect. 3. The manner of development of bone is, however, essentially the same, whether cartilage or a soft blastema be the matrix. In both cases it is developed as an entirely new tissue, and the pre-existing. tissue disappears and gives place to it. It has been seen that the true osseous tissue is first developed in the intercellular substance of the cartilages, and finally the whole of it appears to be converted into bone. There are, however, no facts indicating that chondrine can be converted into gluten, or cartilageine into osteine (p. 100). This element of the cartilage is therefore merely replaced by the osseous tissue. On the other hand, it has been seen that the cartilage-cavities remain for a time, increasing in size and changing their forms; but the cartilage-ceZfe within them, after increasing in number, disappear (except probably their nuclei), the lacunae (and pores) taking their place in part (p...
