Not illustrated. 1870 Excerpt: .Holy Spirit, through Christ, to a dark, sinful, sorrowing world was the subject of discourse. At the close of the sermon it was announced that Signor Cabrera, of Seville, who was passing through Madrid, would hold a supplemental service. To this at least four hundred persons remained. In the afternoon I looked in at several Sunday schools, and in the evening attended service at the Lavapiese. There were from three to four hundred persons present, many of whom had Bibles, and I was exceedingly struck by the readiness and ease with which they turned to the passages of Scripture read or referred to by the preacher. It must not be supposed that these were all the meetings for Protestant worship held in the city at this time. I have merely named those at which I myself was present, and I have reported the impression which they produced on my own mind. There were at least five other services going on simultaneously with that at the Lavapiese, and I was informed that all were well filled, and some were crowded. Comparing the religious condition of Madrid two years ago with that which exists now, one is forcibly reminded of the vision beheld by the prophet Ezekiel in the valley of dry bones. It seemed impossible that those dry bones should live. A religious awakening and revival was beyond the reach of human hope. But already there is a movement and a shaking. We have all possible encouragement...
