Not illustrated. 1901 Excerpt: . was discovered, so many schemes were set afloat for meeting general demands, that up to the present time there remain as open questions which form of smokeless powder is the superior, and whether new and still more efficient forms may not be looked for in the future. In order to reply to these inquiries, it will be necessary first to glance over the compositions of materials capable of conversion into smokeless powders under the following assumptions: (1) That they leave no solid residue after combustion, and that their gases exercise no injurious effect upon the metal of guns; (2) that they undergo no change upon keeping for long periods of time, and contain no volatile ingredients; and (3) that they may be readily prepared in quantities sufficiently abundant for practical needs. There are but few elements capable of producing gases that do not act upon...
