Not illustrated. 1886 Excerpt: .with the quantity of urine excreted; and the higher grades of dropsy indicate extensive damage going on in the kidneys. In the milder grades of dropsy the abdominal cavity only is invaded; while in the more pronounced form the pleural or pericardial cavity may become the seat of serous effusions. Hydrothorax is especially to be dreaded in this disease, owing to the marked tendency of the effused fluid to assume a puriform character, which adds greatly to the gravity of the case. Finally, dropsy may be absent during the whole course of scarlatinal nephritis, but in such cases the disease is always mild. 7!/? Digestive System.--As already stated, the appetite is usually lost early in the disease, and it generally remains more or less impaired throughout. Cases occur, however, in which the appetite remains good, even during the acute period of the disease; and this may mislead the physician as to the gravity of the case, unless he be on his guard. Vomiting is one of the most frequent symptoms of scarlatinal nephritis. This may be purely reflex, or it may be of uraemic origin. In the former case Henoeh points out (op. cit.) that other symptoms, viz., headache and somnolence, which give a serious significance to uraemic vomiting, are absent. It may also be stated, that purely reflex vomiting is most common early in the disease, before the latter has become fully developed; while the vomiting of uraemic origin is mostly present after the disease...
